Whereas linguistic research in the generative paradigm has emphasized the difference between competence and performance, concentrating on the former, recent research by scholars like Langacker, Hawkins, and Bybee has stressed the effect of language use on the shape of grammars. In addition, there will be a course reader containing various articles and excerpts treating the issues we will be considering.

It undertakes to lay the foundations of a semiotic method distinct from monolithic traditional structuralism (e.g., it concentrates on anti-Saussurean thought). In presenting semiotic universals, the seminar pursues the formulation and the application of a theoretical construct valid for any and all semiotic modalities ranging from the literary text, to the language act as text, and to the human being as text.
